Spartans Speak

By Norma Burkus

The Jolly Green Giants proved to be the most popular album.

Just a reminder to the male population of South High: Jingle Bells, Jingle Bells, Jingle all the way to the Winter Formal on Friday, Dec. 17. It's less than two weeks away!

Set aside this Friday, and be ready for activities galore! At 1:30 in the gym, our varsity grapplers will be hosting the second match of the season. Then at eight o'clock, our varsity basketball team will take on Culver City in the first non-league game of the season.

What could possibly bring people back to school on a Friday and Saturday night? Well, the senior class play, "A Thurbur Carnival" managed to draw a good crowd both nights. Congratulations to the cast and the senior class on a job well done.

Law in Action

In a recent case, a wealthy man's widow asked and got the court to allow her $5,000 a month to support her pending probate of her late husband's estate. She needed that amount to continue her standard of living.

These payments are part of the "family allowance" to support the family that comes out of a decedent's estate. After a husband's death, the family may face financial problems and the court will order a family allowance until it orders the estate distributed.

THE COURTS strongly favor the family allowance so long as the estate can pay certain basic expenses such as those for administering the estate, the costs of last illness and the funeral. Other creditors come after the family allowance. After creditors' heirs get what is left. Although the estate cannot pay all creditors, the court can still order the family allowance for up to one year, whether or not the widow or children have other means of support. The court, of course, may reduce the payments in view of these independent means.

In a recent case Mrs. Smith for years before her husband's death had been living apart from him. In fact she had filed for divorce and was getting temporary alimony. When Mr. Smith died, Mrs. Smith asked for a family allowance. Mr. Smith's other heirs objected, claiming that the widow was no longer a part of the "family."

The court ruled for the widow since no divorce had been granted.

NO WIFE would have claim to the allowance if she had deserted or abandoned her husband without reason. She would have renounced her right to it.

However, if the wife had left her husband because he was cruel, she could still claim an allowance upon his death.

Recently a court ruled that a father's illegitimate child, who lived apart, had a claim on a family allowance so long as his father had acknowledged his obligation to the child.

The law also provides for a "probate homestead" which sets aside a modest home for the widow, widower, or minor children before general creditors or other heirs have any right to the estate.
